Pegasus' Travels represents five journeys of Pegasus over vast distances, covering exotic lands, unexpected encounters and colourful circumstances. The trio represents the central body; Beta, Gamma and Delta, omitting the introduction (Alpha) and epilogue (Epsilon).

Pegasus – the magnificent winged stallion in ancient Greek mythology – originally carried thunder and lightning for Zeus in his palace. In later times, Pegasus symbolised poetry and wisdom.

Yet one may consider in isolation the inherent appearance and capacities of this beautiful creature. Pegasus thus exudes unbounded freedom as it passes across borders, perhaps not even aware of them, at great speed; and overcoming of the herd-loving characteristics of its horse-cousins, Pegasus prefers to be away from crowds and takes pleasure in its isolation and independence. But it shares the caprice and life-long playfulness of its horse-cousins; and combining magnificent elegance, unending strength – the stallion is not light but appears so only from the vast wing-strength – and timeliness grace, classical ballet can only strive to reach what is inherent and natural for this majestic creature.

Conceptually the five musical works of Pegasus' Travels can be thought of as “developments upon subjects”. Contrasting traditional “variations upon a theme”, which decorate a fixed musical structure over each movement, Pegasus' Travel instead holds a series of musical themes as atomic, and develops them anew over each movement. Themes also merge to give birth to new themes. One may imagine extending the fugue – which also develops atomic musical themes – to a larger world of varied atmospheres and boundless explorations. Even such a means of development is in the spirit of Pegasus. The musician may represent Pegasus through the music, or further yet, strive to become Pegasus-in-mind.

b (Meros Beta) – Pegasus assists Zeus in his battles and gallops along the Earth to collect fallen lightning.

c (Meros Gamma) – Pegasus, lured by his will, eventually rises above the stormy clouds and learns from the tranquil stars, descending from the cosmos with newfound strength.

d (Meros Delta) – The Muses sing upon Mount Helicon, the mountain shaking in joy, and Pegasus descends upon and punishes the mountain, commanding it to retain its natural boldness.
